"The Tale of the Rumrunner"

The storm came out of nowhere, driving the wooden race boat through blinding rain into the mangroves. Ramiro and Tom struggled to keep their craft afloat long enough to reach safety and save their precious cargo. For a minute the rain let up and an opening in the mangroves appeared, offering the hope of a temporary shelter.

Ramiro Copa, Jr. was a young, adventurous Cuban American living the good life in Key West until the government ended all that with the 18th Amendment and the Prohibition era began. At the age of 23, Ramiro had a way with women...and a way with food. His reputation for both was well known in Key West, but as times got tougher, he began to look for ways to supplement his dwindling income. When the offer of "easy" money came his way, he jumped at the chance. Just take this gorgeous, super-racer up the west coast to Tampa and back. No problem...

A young Irish kid from Chicago, Tom Maloney found himself in the tropical city of Key West looking for a boat in a sleazy, backwater marina. She sat low in the water, the cargo weighing her down below her water line. Tom had sailed Lake Michigan all his life and was a gifted driver in the powerful, new wooden speed boats designed by John Hacker that were the rage of the Great Lakes. Naturally his name came up when a good driver was needed to make runs from Key West to Tampa with special cargo. Tom took the offer and the money.

For the next 10 years, Ramiro, Tom and a race boat called "Magic" made a great team. All three knew their jobs well. Ramiro made the Cuban connection for rum; Tom drove like a madman; and "Magic" carried the load. The money poured in. Then a storm changed their fate just long enough to mark a new destination along their route. Their brief stay on the strip of open land in the mangroves became a regular stop. Hidden from the eyes of the authorities, the snug harbor offered a place to rest, relax and enjoy a meal and a drink on dry land before the next long leg of the trip to Tampa. Ramiro liked the chance to get off the boat and cook some fresh fish; Tom stored fuel and tools for repairs there. The reputation of the little harbor grew among the rumrunners as a safe place to stop for a great meal, and fuel.

In 1930 "Magic" was lost in a storm south of Tampa. Shortly thereafter Prohibition ended and Tom and Ramiro went their separate ways. The little safe harbor slipped back into obscurity as nature reclaimed it...until now. Rumrunners at Cape Harbour Marina is the site of that old stopping off point, and we hope that you will enjoy the tradition of rest, relaxation and good food that Tom and Ramiro started long ago.
